25) What type of information would a software keylogger provide to a threat actor? How could it be used against the victim? A software keylogger might provide information about the users' keystrokes, websites the user accessed, and information the user typed into their computer. The information could be passwords, credit card information, addresses, and other vulnerable data that belongs to the user. The information that the keylogger obtains could be used against the victim if the keylogger exposes the information or uses it for malicious purposes.
